"This film was produced at the request and under the guidance of the United Nations Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People.

It was in production during the Spring and Summer of 1978. Important news developments have taken place since. It appears that, so far, these have not materially altered either the feelings of the Palestinians interviewed here or the human conditions of most of their compatriots."

"You are asking me what it is to be a Palestinian. Well I think that in very simple terms, it is a question of lack of identity."

"And unless, you see, this man finds a place, an anchor, he will always, always, be the stateless, the refugee, the man without an identity and who is searching for this right, and it is a human right."

"To be a Palestinian is to accept the status quo of wherever you happen to be without the real sense of belonging, because strictly speaking you are operating wherever you are at the good will and discretion of the country that is accepting you."

"Wherever he is they tend somehow to look at him as a suspect because he does not have an identity in the sense that he does not have a country, a home. He is stateless."
They have come from Haifa, and Jaffa, from Hebron, and Jerusalem. First in 1948 as their land was occupied. They fled again in 67 and in 70, in 76 and in 78. Each time new hostilities had forced them to seek new shelters. Some have been refugees for over 30 years. Some were born as refugees. But no matter where they came from, or where they now live, these people think of themselves as Palestinians; first and most have but one dream - to return to their homes in Palestine.

Since World War II, the Middle East has been the scene of continuous violence.

In 1947, the United Nations endorsed the creation of one Arab and one Jewish State out of the British mandate in Palestine, under a Partition Plan which provided also for the establishment of an international regime in and around Jerusalem.

Israel was established in 1948; but the Palestinian Arab State never came into being. Since then there have been four full scale wars -- all threats to world peace.
Territorial limits kept moving back and forth...and between and around, during times referred to as "no-war, no-peace", thousands of people from all sides who fell victims to endless attacks, and counter-attacks.

DR. SARI NASIR VO:

"We could very well indeed find a way to co-exist in Palestine with an Israel. But you see we must get guarantees that this Israel will not expand...because ever since the existence of Israel, it has expanded onward and they have tried to erase our identity as Palestinians...

For instance, I started out to be a Palestinian; then, in 1948, I was referred to as a refugee; then I was referred to as a Jordanian, an Egyptian, a Lebanese, a Syrian — and on the way I heard from Golda Meir that I do not exist — and now they call me a terrorist. Eventually, you see, these people have expanded and they have tried to erase my identity."

"Palestine has always been the battleground of empires as well as the meeting place for the exchange of cultures.

There have been waves of people that have come into it, mostly from Arabia, which is the CRADLELAND of all the Semitic peoples. Now these people have intermixed throughout history.

They were Arabized in the middle of the Seventh Century when the Arab Moslem invasion of Palestine took place and, inhabited Palestine for the long course of history."
NARRATOR:

Arab nationalists do not deny the Jewish presence of biblical times - but they point out that this was also the land of the Canaanites and the Philistines...Babylonians, Persians and Greeks were there too, at one period or another. The region was under Roman occupation at the time of Christ - the exodus of the Israelites took place soon thereafter. The fall of the Roman Empire, cleared the way for Arab civilization to blossom.

Then the Moslem Empire was succeeded by Ottoman rule. On the eastern shores of the Mediterranean, this rule was to last until World War I.

The Nineteenth Century witnessed tremendous upheavals. Europe had its industrial revolution. But the Middle East too, was seeking a new identity: after 500 years of Ottoman rule, the idea of sovereignty had begun to revive and many Palestinians and other Arabs launched independence movements.
Since the crusades, three religions had co-existed fairly peacefully in Palestine but by the 1890's, new colonies of Jewish immigrants started to appear; the pogroms the Jews had had to endure in Europe had fostered Zionism, a doctrine calling for regroupment of the Jews in a land to be called the "Land of Israel".

During World War I, the British, seeking assistance for their war effort in the Middle East, wooed both the Arabs and the Zionists. To win the latter's support, in 1917 they promulgated the Balfour Declaration. This Declaration promised British support for the establishment in Palestine of a "national home for the Jewish people", although it was careful to note that "nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine" - and the population of Palestine was over 90% Arab at that time.
When the war ended, rather than becoming independent, most of the Middle East was placed under British and French administrations, under the League of Nations' mandate system. The League's Covenant provided that such territories were heading for eventual self-determination and independence.

For the Palestinian Arabs, the struggle had become two-fold; they wanted termination of the mandate and repeal of the Balfour Declaration, since the establishment of a Jewish homeland meant increased immigration by Jews and appropriation by them of lands the Palestinians had owned, inhabited and cultivated for generations. The period between the two World Wars witnessed a series of Palestinian demonstrations, protests and rebellions.
"If the international community had looked at the Palestine question with justice, they would have recognized that here was a majority of Palestinians and there was a minority of Jews, and that the majority of Palestinians had rights, if not equal, at least greater than the minority of the Jews and that ultimately the best solution for this was one state in which both the Arabs and the Jews would live under one government."

But there was not to be such a state. In 1947, Britain placed the question of Palestine before the United Nations. On the 29th of November a vote was taken to partition the area... There was to be one Jewish and one Arab State...

For the Jews, most of them scarred for life from years of Nazi atrocities in Europe, this was cause for joyful celebration...

But to the Arabs, any partition which granted 56% of the land to 32% of the population was unacceptable. Fighting and skirmishes continued.

On May 14th 1948, a Jewish State self-proclaimed itself under the name of Israel...
Incidents, such as that of the Jewish massacre of Arabs in the village of Deir Yassin, which had taken place in April, had spurred an exodus of refugees. Neighbouring Arab states sent troops into Palestine, claiming they were acting "...for the sole purpose of restoring peace and security and establishing law and order in Palestine".

It became full-scale war.

Numerous U.N. efforts to negotiate a truce were fruitless.

In September 1948, the United Nations Chief Mediator, Count Folke Bernadotte was shot and killed in Jerusalem by a Jewish extremist group.

Only in the Spring of 1949 was an armistice reached. By that time more Arab land had been taken: Israel had already begun to expand its borders.
EDWARD SAID VO:

"The main effect on the population was to create a great deal of panic and fear. The population, for the most part, was unarmed. They were confronting a well-organized and well-armed invasion.

As a result, when events like the massacre of Deir-Yassin, in April of 1948, occurred, panic spread through the population - a population which was in 1947 and then continuing into the Spring of 1948 was not well organized and had no political center to it.

As a result the principal and the main impulse of the people was to run, to get as far away from the fighting, from the terror, as possible."

NARRATOR:

By December 1948, half of the population of Palestine had fled. The following year, the United Nations established UNRWA - the U.N. Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees.

The Agency's mandate: to provide registered refugees, wherever they may live, with food rations and shelter, health care and basic education - enlisting the collaboration of host nations. It was to be, and still is, financed from voluntary contributions. When work got under way, an estimated 500,000 people were getting UNRWA's help. By 1978, the figure had increased to 1,760,000 Palestinians registered to receive care.
In 48, the Assembly had resolved that "the refugees wishing to return to their homes and live at peace with their neighbours should be permitted to do so at the earliest practicable date" or be duly compensated.

This has been reaffirmed by the United Nations every year ever since, but these resolutions failed to be implemented because repatriation in accordance with these resolutions was not permitted by Israel.

EDWARD SAID VO:

"Most of our population is a poor population and those who have to live in camps live in misery and squalor and poverty of a sort that really is intolerable. Nevertheless, since the late 60's, the lot of the camp dweller has been improved - not only by the social, medical and educational services provided in the camps but also for the first time in their lives, they now have a sense that by struggling politically and militarily, and even intellectually, they are beginning to move out of the camps. They are no longer simply forgotten people left to rot there indefinitely."

NARRATOR:

Beirut, Lebanon... In a still recent past, a prosperous metropolis...

Since the mid seventies, a city devastated by an intractable civil war...
For years, affluent people lived in comfort here, not the Palestinians, though: there are an estimated 400,000 of them, here in Lebanon. They are to be found crowded in areas which do not live up, even, to our usual concept of a refugee camp... in urban ghettos which seem to get worse and worse as the years go by.

This is where the Houbishi family lives. Refugees from 1948, they had resettled on the West Bank. The '67 war brought them first to Jordan. Then in '70 they were forced to move into South Lebanon. Now they are here in Beirut. Children were born along the way. The older boys pride themselves on being "fighters" already.

The girls still go to one of the schools for Palestinian children that UNRWA has maintained and run since 1950.
"The Palestinian people, like any other people in the world, have the right of having its own independent educational system that enables them to strengthen his national unity and to express his national Palestinian character. We like to emphasize the role of the masses in the Palestinian struggle through the last 30 years and we like to emphasize the nature of our enemy and we like also to emphasize the difference between Judaism and Zionism as a political movement. We like to put in our pupils' minds the humanitarian nature of our struggle and the humanitarian nature of our social and political aspirations."

NARRATOR:

In the early fifties the first resistance group appeared - El-Fatah. In 1964, the Palestine Liberation Organisation was formed. Ten years later, at a summit meeting of Arab heads of state - the Rabat Conference of 1974 - the PLO was recognized as sole representative of the Palestinian people. That same year the General Assembly of the United Nations accorded it similar recognition.

The PLO is the sole representative of the Palestinian people. We have this organization which has different establishments in many fields. Controlling all our different branches, the Executive Committee, our military forces, our central council, we have our National Conference, which represents all our organizations. Political organizations and syndicates, unions which represent our people inside our occupied territories and outside our occupied territories."
Be they invaders, tourists or refugees, large bodies of foreigners are always resented by the local population and the Palestinians have proved to be no exception. Many refugee camps have become grudgingly accepted enclaves, guarded by PLO soldiers.

PROF. SARI J. NASIR VO:

"Now the question is that the Palestinian, wherever he is, he is at the mercy of others. He is always, always sought, he is always observed, he is always caught, he is always mistreated. And this is the tragedy of the Palestinian today. He doesn't have a place to go."

ENGLISH TRANSLATION:

"We should not forget that war is part of politics and we struggle by all means at our disposal.

We struggle on all different fronts, politically, militarily, diplomatically and socially."

NARRATOR:

Training of the feddayens - the fighters - begins at eighteen ... but few of those who come here do not already have previous experience in weapons and weaponry.

The first operations of Fatah date back to 1965.
To some they are terrorists. To others, they are freedom-fighters and heroes willing to put their lives on the line for the liberation of their homeland...

The songs and dances of the Patah soldiers are also the songs and dances of the children in refugee camps.

Here, they are taught the additional subjects that, they say, UNRWA's regular schools do not offer, or gloss over too quickly. They want to learn more about Palestine, its folklore and its traditions, and about the importance of having a homeland of one's own. Here, they acquire the discipline and toughening which, they hope, will enable them to qualify as fighters, someday.

Decades of exile and life in camps make it difficult for Palestinians to become self-sustaining. From the beginning many started small businesses.
Lots of them still peddle cigarettes or run delivery services in and around the camps, but a lucky few have turned small enterprises into cottage industries which, as they slowly integrate into the local economy, offer employment in turn to other camp-dwellers.

But for the individual, here more than anywhere else, education is the key. Bassam, eldest son of the Houbishis, goes to the university and also keeps a part-time job to contribute to the family's income. Scholarships help many Palestinians to go abroad for graduate study programmes.

"For a Palestinian, it's all over the world the same thing whether it's in Kuwait, Lebanon or anywhere else: you are refused to be in the community. Of course, they do accept you as long as you live there with them, but still you do not belong, you do not have the citizenship, you do not have the same rights and automatically the same feeling would be, whether you are in Lebanon, in Kuwait, or in Saudi Arabia or anywhere else."

Edward Said, again.
"Palestinians have the highest rate of university graduates of any Arab nation. As engineers, as social scientists, as economists, the Palestinians are in fact now the intellectual and even the moral elite of the Arab world."

Unfortunately, there are still too many unskilled, and for them there is, at best, seasonal and temporary work, picking fruit for a local landowner, Lebanese or Jordanian, at harvest time, street-cleaning or other menial jobs in the camps and, for the women, domestics in the home of the more fortunate. Although there is a "Palestinian Workers Union", to protect them from being exploited, the life of these people remains meagre and insecure.

To remedy this situation and better channel the energy and productiveness of the Palestinian people a series of workers' co-operatives got launched in 1970 by Fatah. It is called Samed.
In Arabic, Samed translates as "steadfastness" - the idea of never giving up.

The basic idea is to provide some sort of vocational training to a generation which has known nothing more than camp life - and to equip as many as possible of them to become financially independent - both now, in their diaspora, and also tomorrow when they will have returned to Palestine.

There are several fields of activity - industrial development, craft and cottage enterprises and, even, an agricultural sector, under which a few Palestinians provide technical assistance in several African countries.
So far, 3,000 people are employed full time in the Samed workshops—and that number is increasing steadily. Whether they sew cloth, make embroidery for sale abroad, or assemble furniture to fill the needs of camp-dwellers or the requirements of Palestinian offices, they are—each one of them—contributing to return to self-sufficiency a people who refuse to remain any longer the ward of the world.

The PLO provides other services as well: schools and hospitals, research centers and so forth...

DR. YOUSSEF IRAQI VO:

"You see this hospital is one of the hospitals of the Palestinian Red Crescent society, which is one of the institutions of the PLO. Of course, our services we give to all peoples who need these help. Our plans are divided into two plans for disaster time and for peace time."

"This hospital here is specialized hospital for the cardiovascular surgery and for the pediatric surgery and for the neuro surgery and daily we have in this hospital, at least, two major operations.

We have big problems not only of the wounded, but also we take the responsibility of the refugees. The people who are under great stress especially the small kids, the children."
"Those people are homeless now and we face many problems, especially in the psychological situation of the small kids and of the grown-up people.

They lost all that they have done since they were deported from Palestine in 1948, all that they have built, members of their families, they have lost everything here, so we have to support them, we have to stay beside them."

NARRATOR:

For many, the first move had been to the West Bank. There, they lived in camps but at least they were still in their own country.

In '67, when Israel occupied the rest of Palestine, the West Bank camps emptied themselves in a new mass exodus, this time across the blown-up Allenby Bridge, into Jordan.

Dr. Said says:
"For the first time it became apparent to Palestinians that if they were going to rely exclusively upon the Arab States to wage their struggle for them they would get nowhere and, therefore, Palestinians had to take their own progress towards self-determination in their own hands.

At the moment of the deepest collective Arab failure, the Palestinians began to assert themselves and to take up arms in the struggle towards self-determination."

"In '67, when the rest of Palestine was occupied, I was a soldier in the Jordanian army... The King ordered us to withdraw without fighting... and so the whole of Palestine fell to Zionist control. There had been resistance before... but '67 was when the Palestinian revolution really started: since '67 we've had our own weapons, our own soldiers, we've become public."

Three years later within 48 hours, three airliners were hijacked and forced to land in the Jordanian desert. After days of negotiation, the hostages were freed and the planes destroyed. Palestinians had made the complacent world aware of their plight through dramatic news headlines.

That same year, in Jordan, violent clashes occurred between Palestinian and Jordanian troops.
Many died on both sides, and many Palestinian fighters left for another exile. To Lebanon, this time, and many other places.

But the spirit of resistance and determination to restore their rights was not dead.

What had been common scenes in the streets of Amman just moved to Beirut as Palestinians continued to rally to their cause.

During the sixties, Gaza was the stage for protest and sabotage but, after 1970, little remained of the unrest there.

However, the October war had instilled a new sense of pride to the Arabs. On the occupied West Bank, this was expressed through more and more demonstrations against both the military authorities and the appearance of new Jewish settlers on Arab land. The result was tightened security, numerous arrests and, for some, deportation.
From 1967 till now, the rebuilt Allenby Bridge has become the road to exile for most of the 1,300 people expelled by the Israelis from Gaza and the West Bank.

"We were taken from the military Governor office in Jericho at 12 o'clock noon to the bridge where they reached half of the bridge and they told me that from here you can go but you can't come back. I said, some day I will come back to my country because it's my country.

FORMER MAYOR OF RAMALLAH VO:

We never thought that they will treat us after the occupation like the way they treated the people after the occupation. Demolishing houses, demolishing villages, treating people the way they are treating them. That will create more hatred from the Arabs towards the Jews.

That's why they are still in the camp and they are working in the camp, they are raising their kids in the camp, because they know that some day we are going back. For instance, I can't go back.

I want to go back. Not as a visit, I want to go back and live in my home town. My pharmacy is closed. I can't open my pharmacy. My wife will go there only for one week, two weeks, every summer to renew the permits and come. All my family, all my tribe, if we say, our family. They are living there. I have my land, my house, my interests there. Right, I'm living here, I'm having not a bad time, but still I want to go back to my home town."
Amman is a temporary haven for many Palestinian deportees, their only alternative to Israeli prison.

"They used to hang me from my feet with my... upside down, with my head down and they began to beat me on my feet and on my sexual organs for hours."

Israel concedes that some excesses were committed over the years by its occupying forces... It says that disciplinary measures were taken where cases have been documented, and denies that torture was ever a State policy... but the UN Special Committee to investigate Israeli practices in the occupied territories basing itself on witnesses and press reports, within and outside Israel, stated: "...the indications are very strong that cases of torture occurred and continue to occur."

"My wife and my children are ready now to fight and to be killed in the sake of Palestine. In any time and I have my son, since two months I, he is lost. This is his picture, and I don't feel any sad about him, this is my son, since two months in Lebanon, he is lost."
Many others have gone. And many others will never return. For these men who have never known a land they can call their own, the rebirth of Palestine is the cause.

Unfortunately, killings and hangings, bullets and tanks leave indelible marks in the minds of the young. Proofs are easy to find in the Middle East these days.

Wherever their parents were killed, during one of the many wars and conflicts the Palestinians have known these last thirty years, these orphans are the wards of Fatah. The memory of the parents lives on in the recollection of their sons and daughters.

"I'll be a guerilla, but if my country is liberated I'll be a doctor or engineer. Anything that my country needs me."

Edward Said remarks:
One of the saddest things to see is young children for whom no alternatives exist, except the gun. But I have a feeling that this is changing. Over the years now, there are more Palestinian schools, in which greater emphasis is placed on academic subjects, on widening the educational experience of each child, so that the day is not defined by exercises with the gun.

There is a Palestinian dialect, which is different in Arabic from, let's say, Syrian or Lebanese or Egyptian. There are traditions — there are costumes — the family and clan organizations are different. Cuisine — terms of phrase — popular stories — mythology and so on and so forth. So that you had in Palestine essentially a community — but nevertheless, a cohesive, national community which associated itself with the land.

"I believe the present generation among the Palestinians cannot be called as moderate as the older generation amongst the Palestinians. That's why I think now it's the golden opportunity to have a peaceful settlement with the Israelis — between the Palestinians and the Israelis, provided that the Israelis will recognize the rights of self-determination of the Palestinians and including the establishment of their own independent State on what remains of the Palestinian soil that was occupied in 1967."

Going home for a short visit is the hope of most Palestinians in diaspora. During the months when the Israeli military authorities implement this right of family-reunions, thousands try to take advantage of it.
process only two dozen buses each day, some have to return time after time, hoping that tomorrow, they will get their chance. On the other side of the river, there will be more security, body searches, customs duties which sometimes make it necessary to abandon gifts or purchases behind.

Some do not go back by way of the bridge... They are guerillas who find their own way across borders... Their missions illustrate the conflict between what is justifiable to them and what is inexcusable to others.
This took place in Maalot, Israel, in 1974 following a raid at the school there by the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine. Twenty-one Israeli children and four adults were killed that day.

There are differences of opinions among Palestinians regarding the extent to which violence is justifiable.

The killing of innocent civilians such as Israeli athletes at the Munich Olympics or travellers at Lod Airport brought widespread international condemnation.

"We are against all this violence... The PLO is against it and we have declared it many times...but we have to remember, and to look to this case from all its views..."

NARRATOR:

The PLO still accepts responsibility for raids inside Israel.

But violence continues on both sides. This took place in Azziyeh, Southern Lebanon, after an Israeli air raid. Over 100 were killed - men, women and children.
Similar military actions have been taken over the years by Israel against Palestinian camps in other Arab countries, in some cases following guerilla raids inside Israel or against Israeli interests elsewhere. Violence breeds hatred...retaliation brings only further retaliation. "an eye for an eye" if often paid at high interest rates.in our day and age.

Events of these last years have made the world painfully aware that the Palestinian people and the recognition and implementation of their rights are the key to any solution in the Middle East. They are there - they are a fact. Like it or not, no formula can be found, no resolution implemented, which does not take their inalienable rights into consideration.

LORD CARADON VO:
"The Security Council, expressing its continuing concern with the grave situation in the Middle East."
From the creation of the United Nations to this day, no topic has been the subject of more debates and deliberation by the world body. Following the 1967 war, the Security Council adopted the all-important Resolution 242.

However, the PLO found this resolution objectionable.

"The United Nations Security Council Resolution 242 is not accepted by the Palestinians for the following reasons: first of all, it ignored the national rights of the Palestinians; the second thing, it didn't mention about the national rights of the Palestinians and looked to the matter as if it is a conflict between the Arab States and Israel, although the crux of the problem in the Middle East is the Palestinian cause."
THE GENEVA PEACE CONFERENCE, 1973

NARRATOR:

Geneva, December 1973:

Since the first session of the Geneva Peace Conference, several significant developments affecting the Palestinians have taken place.

United Nations General Assembly Resolution 3375 requests the participation of the PLO in all peace efforts, on an equal footing with all other parties. Israel remains opposed to this on the ground that, among other things, 242 calls for negotiation among States — and the PLO is not a State — and also because they have always refused to deal with groups which they see as bent on destroying Israel.

In 1974 and 75, the General Assembly proclaimed its Resolutions 3236 and 3375, which respectively affirm the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people and recognize the PLO as its representative in the deliberations of the United Nations.
"It is mentioned in the United Nations Resolution 3236 that the Palestinians have their own inalienable rights, including the right for self-determination, for their sovereignty and independence...and for their repatriation to their homeland...and we see to it that this settlement should take into consideration all these rights - national rights - of the Palestinians."

NARRATOR:

Yassir Arafat comes to address the General Assembly.

YASSIR ARAFAT SPEAKING (IN ARABIC):

"I appeal to you, further, to aid our people's return to its homeland from an involuntary exile imposed on it by force of arms, by tyranny, by oppression...so that we can regain our property, our land, and thereafter live in our national homeland, free and sovereign, enjoying all the privileges of nationhood.

Today I have come bearing an olive branch and a freedom-fighter's gun... Do not let the olive branch fall from my hand. I repeat: do not let the olive branch fall from my hand.

Homelessness...stateless...even without an identity card...we haven't a flag...we haven't a state...we haven't a home...we haven't anything concerning human being rights - but except misery and this diaspora. But we kept a very important thing: our will and determination and, for this, we are still existing."

YASSIR ARAFAT VO:

"We started from zero...but we are now the important number in this area, in this formula."
NADIM ZARU VO:

"We are not after ten years - or three years - or just solving a problem like this. No, we want our rights, we want our land, we want to go back and live in Palestine."

ARCHDEACON KHOURI VO:

"We are struggling to regain our own identity. This is a divine right, that is given to us by God."

FAROUK KHADOMI VO:

"I think that the Palestinians, they are well educated and well cultured. They can take part in all fields of human activity: be it scientific, arts, literature. I think as a small nation we can take part."

BACHAWI VO:

"This is my feeling and I am ready to leave everything here and go back to my home - everything. I am ready to start from zero even."

PROF. SARI J. NASIR VO:

"Do not deny the people who were the original owners the right to go back. Do not deny the Palestinian per se the right to perform as a human being."

DR. ARIF ISA KAFENA VO:

"I am a human being. If the world wants me to abide by the morality of humanity then they must treat me as a human being."

NARRATOR:

GENERAL ASSEMBLY PRESIDENT (IN SPANISH):

"We are complying today in this ceremony with one of the specific recommendations that the Charter mandates to our Organization; the recognition of the fundamental rights of one of the peoples which constitutes mankind...
The inalienable rights that, in countless documents, are demanded for the Palestinian people."

UN SECRETARY-GENERAL KURT WALDHEIM
ON CAMERA

"Ladies and gentlemen, today we commemorate, for the first time, the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian people...

The General Assembly, in 1974, began tackling the political aspects of the Palestinian question. In that year the General Assembly adopted Resolution 3236, which reaffirmed the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to self-determination, the right to national independence and sovereignty, and the right of the Palestinians to return to their homes and property...

AMBASSADOR FALL (IN FRENCH):

"Right from the start some chose to pre-judge the Committee's work and declared that it would not be impartial. In fact, in order to encourage the contribution of all sectors, one of the first actions of the Committee was to invite all Member States to participate in its work as observers, an invitation repeated in '77.

The Committee in due course made its recommendations after careful and objective consideration and in strict conformity with its mandate.

These recommendations were based on widely accepted U.N. resolutions and the following principles:
(1) the Question of Palestine is the heart of the Middle East problem and no solution could be envisaged without taking into account the rights of the Palestinian people;

(2) the realisation of these inalienable rights would contribute to a solution of the Middle East crisis;

(3) the PLO as the representative of the Palestinian people should participate on an equal footing with other parties in all conferences on the Middle East held under United Nations auspices;

(4) the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force and Israel's obligation to withdraw completely and quickly from all territory so occupied.

The recommendations were widely supported in the Security Council but not endorsed due to the veto of a permanent member. However, the Assembly, subsequently, endorsed the Committee's recommendations by 90 in favour, 16 against and 30 abstentions. In its second report the Committee reaffirmed their validity and the urgency of implementation. The Assembly reconfirmed its endorsement by an even larger vote.

Although Israel and some other countries have persisted in opposing implementation, we are convinced that these recommendations would form the basis for a just peace.

Some have pointed out that no reference is made to the right of Israel to exist as an independent State. The answer is that this is not within the mandate of the Committee. Their worry is unfounded since at no stage was the independence of Israel questioned inasmuch as it is a Member State of the U.N.

I must add that Israel was created by United Nations Resolution 181 of November 29th, 1947. That same resolution made provision for a Palestinian State which Israel does not wish to recognize.
"I am a human being. If the world wants me to abide by the morality of humanity then they must treat me as a human being."
